

Editors' Note

Society has seen the advent of technologies that have significantly increased standards of living. However, not everyone has shared equally in the fruits of our innovation. The further we progress as a society, the more mindful we must be of those that get left behind and the new problems we must face. We must always strive to make our successes inclusive and “stand out firmly for justice.”

With this in mind, we are pleased to present the first issue of the inaugural edition of The UC Davis Social Justice Law Review, formerly known as the UC Davis Journal of Juvenile Law & Policy. In an effort to bring attention to a wider array of social topics and obstacles facing marginalized groups, the UC Davis Social Justice Law Review will now publish articles by the brightest legal scholars and new voices of the legal community.

Our first piece is a foreword by Dean Kevin Johnson of UC Davis School of Law.

Next, we proudly present “Radical Method” by Richard Delgado and Jean Stefancic, a look at the sources of information legal and critical race scholars use in their research.

Our final piece is an homage to the former UC Davis Journal of Juvenile Law & Policy, “Child Separation from Incarcerated Mothers.” Jaimie M. Carlson discusses the difficulties encountered by incarcerated mothers and their young children as well as the systems we can use to address these issues.

We would like to thank all of our esteemed writers and hardworking editors, scholars and students that share a common drive towards progress. We would also like to thank Professor Courtney Joslin, without whose kind guidance we would not be here.

Sincerely,
Weslina Hung and Musa Dajani
